四、閱讀測驗【請在下列各題中選出最適當的答案】

In recent years, a significant trend has emerged across various sectors of the American economy, as companies have started to streamline their product offerings. This movement, which predates the COVID-19 pandemic, has become more pronounced in recent months. Coca-Cola, for instance, has halved its beverage portfolio, discontinuing around 200 of its drink varieties, including notable products like Tab, Zico coconut water, Diet Coke Feisty Cherry, and Odwalla juices. This trend is not exclusive to the beverage industry; it extends to food items, from mayonnaise to cereals, and even to the automotive sector, where companies are reducing the number of car models and options to concentrate on best-sellers.

Retail chains like Stew Leonard's have dramatically cut down their cereal offerings, and Edgewell Personal Care Co., known for Schick razors and Banana Boat suntan lotion, has similarly streamlined its product lines. Dollar General has reduced its mayonnaise varieties, emphasizing efficiency over variety. This strategy reflects a deeper understanding of consumer behavior, suggesting that too many choices can be overwhelming and counterproductive. Market research supports this approach, indicating that new products now make up a smaller percentage of store items compared to pre-pandemic levels. Studies have shown that a limited selection can result in increased sales, a phenomenon highlighted by psychologists Sheena Iyengar and Mark Lepper in their jam study, which found that consumers were more likely to make a purchase when presented with fewer options.

This shift towards simplification is a strategic response to changing market dynamics and consumer preferences, emphasizing the importance of focused and efficient product assortments. Retailers and manufacturers are navigating these changes with careful planning to ensure they meet consumer needs without cluttering the marketplace.

① Increases likelihood of purchase                      ② Decreases likelihood of purchase
